

Ami:

When we were going to court for the trial, it was extremely scary for me because that's an unknown territory. This woman was out to destroy me.

My name is Ami. I live in Garner, North Carolina. I supervise employees at a warehouse. I sought out a family attorney because I had been sued by my best friend's ex-wife. This lawsuit was over alienation of affection and criminal conversation. My best friend was going through some troubling times in his marriage and eventually divorced. He had confided in me as he did with other friends, but she made a lot of allegations toward me because my best friend eventually became my husband. She was very vindictive because her marriage ended. She felt like she needed somewhere to point that at. She was trying to destroy my character, completely obliterate it.

The major thing I didn't know in this specific case was that my past and everything would be so delved into and that a person could really be sued, and you don't have a choice. You have to show up and defend yourself. I did briefly speak with one other attorney, and I had a gut feeling that I couldn't trust that attorney. What I was looking for in an attorney was trust and support, that I needed somebody to defend me and to believe me. I felt like Angela was the perfect person for that. Her process was to make sure I stayed informed, and she answered all my questions. I felt like we were truly working together like a team. She really helped me through the whole process.

We went to trial, the case was dismissed, so it was a big, huge relief for myself and my family because that threat that was hanging over us from her side was diminished. It was gone. The full harassment of her had been years, but we had Angela for that short period toward the end. That's when it really picked up, and then we got to the finish line a lot quicker. I trusted that Angela would pull it through, and she absolutely did. Anybody that needs a trustworthy, caring attorney that embraces everybody, no matter who you are, I would definitely point them to Angela in a heartbeat.
